

Brief Synopsis

Tee & Tea

To John Smith, life is a bummer... his marriage is falling apart, his finances are out of control, he hates his job and he's failed to achieve the dream that his father had for him and that he viscerally had adopted for himself – to be a golf pro. John enjoys one other thing on a level with playing golf – sneaking off to a private place and drinking tea – hot tea and the more exotic the better. Learning that there is a new tea shop at the mall, John hurries over to hopefully find an unusual brew – one that he'd never had before. He found what he was looking for.

Inexplicably John begins to have days on the fairways and greens when he plays like a pro. On other days, he's back to his old duffer self. He finally figures out that there's actually a pattern, a magical link, to his erratic play. John goes on to become a phenom on the local greens and amazingly winds up making the cut for the US Open and wowing everyone there.

In the end John Smith discovers that he didn't need the "magic" that he thought had gotten him to the top of the game at all and more important... he didn't need to win.
